What are the most common explanations for why supervisors do not refer troubled employees to an EAP?

Where EAPs are under promoted, the most common explanations for why supervisors do not refer troubled employees include not thinking of it or not knowing they can. Where EAPs are well promoted, reasons include thinking they wouldn’t be effective “in this case” or believing the program would be a “safe harbor” to protect the employee from administrative action. Remembering to use the EAP is aided by regular communication (such as a newsletter). Believing the program wouldn’t work is common among those supervisors who “diagnose” their employees, believing they know what problem ails the employee, and think the EAP is not the right solution. The safe harbor is a misconception. EAP policies state that employees can’t use an EAP to excuse performance or to find refuge from the consequences of ongoing performance problems. Another common explanation for non-referral is confusion on the part of the supervisor who witnesses a dramatic cycle of poor performance or attendance problems interspersed with periods of exceptional or satisfactory performance. The pattern is enough to postpone the referral of an employee for years, even decades. Consult with your HR or IMPACT Representative with any employee issue to see if an EAP referral is appropriate.

How can I help employees be less territorial and more open to others’ ideas, perspectives, and suggestions when they need to work together as a team?

Employee cooperation in a team environment requires a work culture that is maintained and nurtured so that cooperation becomes a tradition. Without this supportive environment, teams fracture and individuals become competitive. Conflicts ensue, cliques emerge, and productivity suffers. Symptoms of this fracturing include poor information sharing, lack of mutual help in solving problems, poor communication, and vying for credit. The good news is that humans have innate skills to work in teams. Discover what reinforces lack of cooperation and undermines team thinking. Consider giving everyone a refresher in how teams work and their value. Hold discussions to process specific issues or roadblocks to the team’s effectiveness. Next, add practical exercises designed to build more trust. Be sure to set expectations, and ask the EAP for possible resources with regard to your effort. Make sure teams meet, and reward both team cooperation and individual participation going forward. Review the ‘Effective Manager’ section of the ‘Working’ module online at www.MyIMPACTSolution.com for more tools and tips on helping develop your team and their ability to work together.
We have an employee who comes to work late, and it causes problems for everyone. What’s got me stumped is why this person is not confronted by peers. The employee is likeable, and we all know about his heavy drinking, but why this enabling?

When documenting performance problems of troubled employees, what critical factors are important to bear in mind so the documentation is effective when given to an employee in a corrective letter or used later in an administrative action?

I know supervisors should not be discussing personal problems with employees and instead should refer to the EAP. I don’t wish to interfere with employees seeking help, but how do I manage becoming a supervisor who no longer listens when I’ve always played this role?

You can still be a warm and approachable supervisor who listens. In fact, nothing could be more helpful to the EAP, because you are trusted by employees and in an ideal position to facilitate their self-referral. The important issue is avoiding the counseling role. Crossing this line impedes employee motivation to seek proper help from the EAP. It also dissipates a feeling of urgency needed to hurdle the resistance most employees face in their decision to get professional help. Listen and be encouraging and supportive, but make the EAP the trusted source of help for the complete answer or solution to their troubles. Read the article “How to Listen to Someone Who Is Hurting” online at www.MyIMPACTSolution.com for tips on providing support to your employees. Contact your HR or IMPACT Representative for additional advice on how to informally refer an employee to the EAP.

If your employee had no alcohol problem, ironically, he might be confronted more readily by peers. Assuming employees believe the lateness is explained by alcoholism, they may feel unable to be assertive and confront the behavior. Here’s why: Alcoholism still suffers from enormous misconceptions. For most of history, alcoholism has been wrongly identified as a personality disorder or the result of moral or psychological weakness. Of course, alcoholism is a disease. Still, these pervasive misconceptions turn alcoholism into an accusation. This is what makes people back off. Because the lateness is believed to be associated with alcoholism, employees enable by remaining silent while hoping for change someday. Consult with your HR or IMPACT Representative to help address workplace performance issues like attendance while leveraging the professional knowledge of the EAP to address any potential personal concerns of the employee, such as suspected alcohol abuse.

Most troubled employees are frustrated and defensive because of their inability to self-treat or resolve a personal problem. This leads them not only to practice denial and react adversely to confrontations but also to read a corrective letter or warning notice with an eye toward finding any part of it that could be viewed as inaccurate, untrue, or exaggerated. These parts of the corrective letter will get the most attention. This means your documentation must be accurate, detailed, and written with the understanding that your employee will seek to find fault with it. The most problematic corrective memos omit specifics, use subjective language, focus on employee personality issues, or use psychological terms that refer to the personality of the employee rather than the behavior. Use the consultative help of your IMPACT Representative to gain insight on how to avoid these documentation missteps.

Important Notice: Information in FrontLine Supervisor is for general information purposes only and is not intended to replace the counsel or advice of a qualified health professional. Any similarity to actual events/people are purely coincidental. For further help, or to access IMPACT Solutions, call 800-227-6007. The FrontLine Supervisor is copyright protected by DFA Publishing LLC, 2014.