

New biomarker found for aggressive cancers

U.S. researchers say they have determined a form of the protein that causes blood clotting might also become a new biomarker for aggressive cancers.

University of Cincinnati researchers, members of an international team of scientists, said the recently discovered protein -- called "Tissue Factor" -- might play a key role in the molecular mechanisms leading to the growth of certain metastatic cancers. . . . more