Music Hall is the cultural anchor of the Washington Park neighborhood. Its patrons will help fuel the neighborhood economy by utilizing its assets. The new School for Creative and Performing Arts (K-12) will also contribute to more daytime culinary needs.

Washington Park Elementary school will be moving to a new site off the parks grounds. This audience is similar to SCPA; however there will be more young children in and around the park during certain hours of the day. This will be kept in mind by supplying possible ice cream vendors around the park and restaurants/deli’s/vendors for lunch for teachers at both schools, and surrounding businesses.

The new mixed use parking garage with housing will also contribute to the need for food in and around the neighborhood.

The Art Academy of Cincinnati will be another educational asset to the neighborhood along with an ever growing need to feed a growing population.
Through a transitional training service, the hard-to-employ and the homeless that call Washington Park their home would be part of a progressive venue for homeless employment. The new headquarters for Cincinnati COOKS! would offer a permanent base for immediate employment of its trainees in a park-side cafe, creating a venue for the healthy integration of the diversity of Cincinnatians occupying the area and serving as a model for future neighborhood development. Although this sounds fairly straightforward, there needs to be a strong committment from the city, community, and invested interest by urban designers in order to produce any long lasting solutions to Washington Park's social predicament, the current dichotomy of the social problems and physical needs.
